

RELIGION AND NURSES' ATTITUDES TO EUTHANASIA AND PHYSICIAN ASSISTED SUICIDE

John Clarke, Mary Ann Donohue and Don Johnston

Background: Nurses' attitudes toward active physician-assisted suicide depend on many factors. An exploratory study conducted across the religious, religious and non-religious communities, with a focus on the religious and ethnic diversity of the United States, found that nurses' attitudes toward active physician-assisted suicide were more positive in religiously diverse communities. Religious diversity was associated with more positive attitudes toward active physician-assisted suicide in both religious and non-religious communities. The study also found that nurses' attitudes toward active physician-assisted suicide were more positive in religiously diverse communities. The study also found that nurses' attitudes toward active physician-assisted suicide were more positive in religiously diverse communities. The study also found that nurses' attitudes toward active physician-assisted suicide were more positive in religiously diverse communities.

Introduction

Religion, culture, habit and custom generally, philosophy and world view, constitute the most profound influences on the attitudes of individuals. In religiously diverse communities, it is expected to find a greater diversity of views. In fact, the attitudes of religious and ethnic diversity have been found to be more positive toward active physician-assisted suicide in religiously diverse communities. The study also found that nurses' attitudes toward active physician-assisted suicide were more positive in religiously diverse communities. The study also found that nurses' attitudes toward active physician-assisted suicide were more positive in religiously diverse communities. The study also found that nurses' attitudes toward active physician-assisted suicide were more positive in religiously diverse communities.
